Strengthening U.S. defense capabilities with cutting-edge Canadian innovation

CAE, a global leader in aerospace training and simulation technology headquartered in Montreal, Canada, has launched an advanced training solution for the U.S. Army's High Accuracy Detection and Exploitation Systems (HADES) at its Dothan Training Center in Alabama.

This state-of-the-art system, featuring a full-flight simulator for the Bombardier Global 6500 aircraft, supports the Army's Intelligence, Surveillance, and Reconnaissance (ISR) operations. With the highest-level flight simulator certification, it enables U.S. Army aviators to train more efficiently, ensuring they are mission-ready in any environment.

By integrating Canadian expertise into U.S. defense operations, CAE's technology enhances readiness, improves operational efficiency, and strengthens allied cooperation.

"Our partnership with CAE is a reflection of the value we place in leveraging industry-leading technology partnered with rock-solid training fundamentals." — SES Andrew Evans, Director of the U.S. Army ISR Task Force

Li-Cycle strengthens U.S. battery supply chain with Alabama facility

Canadian battery recycling leader Li-Cycle has expanded its U.S. footprint with a 100,000-square-foot facility in Tuscaloosa, Alabama, creating 45 new jobs and boosting domestic battery supply chain resilience. With an additional 120,000 square feet of warehousing, the site enhances Li-Cycle's ability to support battery manufacturers and automakers across the Southeastern U.S. as EV production surges.

Using its innovative Spoke and Hub technologies, Li-Cycle is onshoring critical battery material production, reducing reliance on foreign supply chains, and contributing to American energy independence. As battery and EV manufacturing accelerates, so does the need for sustainable recycling solutions to manage production scrap and end-of-life batteries.

"Li-Cycle's new battery recycling facility in Tuscaloosa adds a dynamic new dimension to Alabama's evolving auto industry," said Governor Kay Ivey.

With Canadian expertise fueling U.S. clean energy growth, Li-Cycle is helping build a stronger, more resilient North American EV supply chain.
